To begin with, Mrs. Leonard says she made of wonderful mothered fifteen children in the course | 1 e t a l lic - looking of her miserable marital career. Five of these lived, and will be called to ("In town") of the testify to their father's violent acts and stage she delights almost unbelievable brutality.

After stating in general terms that the dressed of French tiny woman's existence following her actresses, but never marriage to Leonard in 1881 had been does she forget to one long career of misery and pain emphasize her tiny caused by his inhumanity, the complaint goes on to state specific acts. "Knocked Out Teeth."

A year ago, it alleges, when Leonard in the world who was unable to find his revolver he makes much of her struck his wife in the face, knocking own lack of charm. out two of her teeth and throwing her On the stage her across the room. Her twelve-year-old actions are as pert girl Mathilde ran to her mother's as- and audacious as sistance, whereupon Leonard, it is the Parisian street charged, thrust the child aside, seized gamin whose idol a heavy piece of ornamental rock from he is, as well as sothe mantelpiece and hurled it at his clety's latest amusewife's head. The rock opened the flesh ment. of her forehead in a deep wound and rendered the little woman unconscious. A deep scar testifies to this assault.

one of his savage rages he seized his wife by the hair and dragged her through the house from room to room, and at last, after kicking and beating her, he cast her down a flight of steps. At that time his twenty-one-year-old son, Frederick, a cripple, lay sick in bed in an upstairs room. The boy was suffering from appendicitis and had been attended by two physicians. When he heard his mother's screams, it is alleged, as she was being dragged about by the hair, he cried out to his father

But the fine did not have a softening effect upon Leonard's disposition. Selecting his wife, the cripled boy and the litle daughter Mathilda as the special objects of his wrath, he thrust them out of their home time and again, it is alleged, compelling them to sleep in hallways or anywhere else they could find shelter.

Only a month ago, it is alleged, this unfortunate trio were thrown out of their home on a bitter cold night and compelled to huddle together in a freezing halway all night long. Next morning they managed to crawl into one of the lower rooms of their house, but the door was locked upon them so they were cut off from access to any other part of the house.

Leonard, during their exile, lived in the rest of the house with his three other children, compelling his nineteen-year-old boy, Louis, to do the cooking.

It is further charged that the policeman did not provide his wife and the two chilren he locked in the one room with her with food, and that within the past month he has given them only five cents.

The boy is so healthy and so fond of the milk bottle that it has to be kept constantly filled at his side. There is a report he was to be named "William Taft Shuttleworth," but to-day the father declared he had changed his mind, and that the frisky, noisy youngster should have his own name-Richard. The girls are to be named Jennie, for the mother, and Eva, for the maternal grandmother. Mrs. Shuttleworth, in addition to the ribbons she put on to-day so she could tell which was which triplet, has bought three silver-ornamented bottles, which have made such a hit with the youngsters they would have to be pried loose by any one who wanted to take them away. She keps them all in a basket beside her bed, and expects to have them out riding in the three-seated perambulator being built for them in a few days.
